Generation Z

There are differences and similarities between generations because of some factors. These factors may be the result of socio- economic or environmental influencers, which shape the points of view of the individuals. Generation Z was born from the mid-1990s to the late 2000s; therefore, a considerable number of this generation is still under the age of 18. Generation Z have very strong information technology and social media skills because of the rapid developments of digital technology in this era; that’s why they have also been called the neo-digital natives.

Being grown up with a great knowledge of using social media networks effectively, this generation can contact to anyone around the world at a moment’s notice, and share and reach whatever information required for them. For this generation, electronics that were a luxury to their parents and older siblings, have always been a necessity for living in the modern world. The extraordinary technological advances of the last 20th century are just a normal part of their lives. For example, for generation Z, music has always been consumed and shared digitally; however, the previous generation were able to listen to music through taping songs from the radio, then burning CDs, then bluetoothing music files from one phone to another.

This generation, undoubtedly, will see the same tremendous changes in technology in their adult lives as baby boomers, gen X and millennials have done in theirs – but with their early experiences, generation Z may well be better able to adapt and cope.
